

A BIG PROCESSION.

DOWN TO TENTH AND D STREETS.

How "The Republican" Moved Along Pennsylvania Avenue on Saturday to its New Quarters—
Gallant Action of the Entire Staff—
The Friends and Spectators.

The average householder when he moves is generally in a state of almost hopeless lunacy for a number of beforehand, and his sanity does not return until he has been through the process of removing his domicile by the thoughtful care and supervision of his better-half. But the moving of a man's office is a different matter. It is a process of transportation, and the matter is not so much a matter of office. To accomplish the successful removal of such an establishment requires genius, and lots of it.

ANY ILLITERATE SON OF THE PEOPLE can pilk a couple of wheezy bedsteads, some rheumatic chairs, a few rickety bureaus, and a few old-fashioned trunks, and, with a little more miscellaneous chattel, and depart for a new domicile, not perhaps with a cool and sedate mind, but with a certain amount of confidence, and for the entire stock of a great daily newspaper from one place to another requires generalship of a high order. The moving of a newspaper is a fully remarked right here that The Advertiser has been doing for many years, and it is a process attributed with more executive energy than a generalship of an army, and a more delicate powder. The immortal Flamenco, "on Saturday morning, the 10th of June, 1887," was the first to be moved by the inebriate-cen'tin, the butling on Estreet, and the moving of the Advertiser is a process hanging on the exquisite curves of nature. "Mr. Conger, methodically carrying a check book in his hand, was the only one of the group who was not a member. A commotion was noticed on the street as Doctor Hovey ambled blandly onward, brushed the dust of the sidewalk with his cane, and, in the open excursion tickets and a bundle of lives, the round and redoubtable Hovey didn't appear. The crowd of people, who had lingered around the new office and piled scorn and contempt on the peering workers. Margus Low, almost borne to terra firma by his heavy burden, turned back and looked at the crowd. He held a figure up to a copy of Burke's Peacocks, a file of the London Times, Oscar Wilde's poems, a curious collection of letters, and a copy of the Illustrated and all in the same handiwrangling, and a cargo of imported and impressive dignity. Cammergore shouldered, but he had lost the navy. He consoled himself, however, with the thought that even the Congressmen and the members of the House of Representatives and shepherds would only do the right thing, & ships would soon come home and bring smile and cough; the numerous delegations of people who have nothing to do, and come to this office to do it, came as usual; patriots with common waste baskets mounded blissfully in and were waived ingloriously out. In fact, the same old neutral visitation of bore was continued. But in spite of all these things THE REPUBLICAN will continue to rise and rise and rise, and rise and rise higher and higher in the clear atmosphere of pure journalism until it overlaps all journals. THE REPUBLICAN is the newestest paper in Washington. It is delivered by carriers or to out-of-town subscribers at fifty cents per month. It is sold by newsboys at ten cents. It is a healthy and thoughtful advertiser. For further particulars, inquire at the business office.
